

Brian Alexander Topic Description

Realizing Human Potential in the Workplace looks at the dynamics of individual and group performance in contrast to the built environment. It highlights cognitive potential as an aspect of individual well being and subsequently one of an organization's greatest assets. The primary objective is to establish a framework of understanding around qualitative environmental features, from the granular to the grand and resolve their impact on human performance in the context of a business endeavor.